

I feel my style as a photographer is portraits. I believe this because when I take my photographs, I think that I am best at setting up a model and being able to move my subject around, rather than shooting something still and restricted such as nature or a city. I try to shoot at different angles and try to use the environment I'm in as much as I can to make my photo more interesting. I think my work reflects my personality, trying to find new things to improve what I'm doing. I get inspired when I find an awesome place to shoot at or if that day is abnormal from others. I am also inspired to try my hardest when it comes down to trying to turn in the best work I possibly can. I take my time on my photo's, usually taking several shots of the same subject in the same position hoping to get a few that turned out good. I would like to try to get into food photography and photography that involves more of me setting up the photo rather than having a good model. I hope to make a boring subject very interesting in my photos. I try to put in as much emotion as I can into my photos, using the subject as the main emotion, but using the background to and lighting to add the perfect emotion to the subject. I have greatly been influenced by my classmates and photography teacher, learning new techniques and new styles of photography. I have also been influenced by flickr.com, trying to put up work that my viewers will like, and trying to show the best work I can. My photos make me feel greatly accomplished, depending on the photo. I try to attempt new methods into my photos, and try to add as many techniques into my portraits. I enjoy to add shallow depth of field, sharp focus, a lot of contrast, new angles, and natural lighting. My work really affects the person I am and helps me to have a creative mind that forms my personality and my photos.
