

When I take photos I don't think about posing a person the perfect way or getting the perfect shot, all I think about is that a photo could look good naturally. When I take portraits I usually just tell people to be themselves and I take the picture when they least expect it. I don't really spend much time contemplating what I should do I just take a bunch of pictures and pick out the ones that turned out.

I think my photos tell a story about me more than anything else. They show how much of an outgoing kind of funny person I am. I put the photos I did in here because I believe that they show me for who I am. When I take a picture I want it to reflect what I am feeling at the time, and most of the time when I take photos I am happy.

My inspiration is mostly my friends. When I'm around my friends I just feel like me and that I feel is the best time to take photos. When you feel that the right photo is there it really is and it should just happen. I believe that you can't force a good picture. To me when people try to pose a person in the perfect way or make the background just right, it's ruining the photo.

I would have to say that I don't really have a set style. All my photos are different and they all have their own certain grasp on the situation. I do some photos really dark and some light, others I just wing it and if it looks good I go with it. I don't feel that you have to have a style to be a good artistic photographer, just as long as you like your work then it's good work.

In all I feel that art should be a feeling of the artist. And I plan in the future to just be me and if it comes to me taking photos or drawing or playing a symphony it will all be because that's how I feel, just like art should be.
